What is CDD?

Community-Driven Development (CDD) is a process that encourages citizens to be more active in their community's development.

CDD empowers the people by giving them control and decision-making powers over resources in their communities.

It allows communities to maximize limited resources by prioritizing their most pressing needs.

CDD treats people as assets and partners in the development process.

Advantages of
CDD institutionalization

Community-Driven Development will complement the Local Government Code by providing mechanisms to operationalize and sustain self-reliant communities through a proven system of informing, developing, and harnessing constituents to become resilient.

> CDD helps local governments make informed decisions using readily-available community-identified needs as a basis for creating local development plans.

Institutionalizing Participation

Institutionalizing CDD provides a means to engage in:

- Community action planning;
- Community-based financial management;
- Community-based procurement;
- Community-managed implementation; and
- Community-based monitoring and evaluation

Participation and inclusivity is the heart of CDD

Encouraging the people to identify their problems and giving them the power to choose, implement, and manage appropriate solutions, gives communities a sense of ownership over local development projects.

Institutionalizing
Transparency

The execution, implementation, monitoring, and contract management of community-identified projects is led by the community itself while the Local Government Units (LGUs) provide assistance.

Through the community's participation in all levels of decision-making, the development and implementation vof projects remain transparent.

Transparency is integral to CDD

Institutionalizing

Accountability

Community members engage in monitoring and evaluation of projects. They are empowered to identify and take corrective actions based on information that they themselves chose to take into consideration.

Accountability is assured in CDD

Operationalizing
the CDD Bill

The CDD Bill enables community members to meaningfully participate in the development process and ensure that community members are prioritized in employment opportunities from community-based projects.

National government agencies and local government units shall:

- Develop policies for enhancing participatory governance practices, tapping community organizations particularly the basic sectors, and responding to community needs;

- Provide information on government intervention, technical assistance, and support to partner communities for more effective community-driven planning and implementation;
- Enable community members to meaningfully participate in the development process;
- Ensure that community members are prioritized in receiving employment opportunities brought about by project implementation in the community; and
- Ensure that identified community priorities are sufficiently funded.
